1. Name of the academic program and the department(s) or unit(s) that will administer the program.

This will be a combined major (B.A.) in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies, administered by the Department of Religious Studies.

2. A thorough justification, including the motivation for the creation of the program in terms of student interest and professional or academic importance.

Since the 2008 recession, there has been a nationwide trend of steady or even increasing interest in religious studies courses among undergraduates, combined with a trend of falling major numbers. Most commentators attribute this unusual combination to a growing concern among undergraduate students with selecting a major that they believe offers career-relevant skill building; in other words, a major that they (and, at times, their parents) believe will get them a well-paying job immediately after graduation.

Working in a field that, like gender and sexuality studies or ethnic studies, focuses on the transdisciplinary study of a specific aspect of human experience and social structure, we in religious studies are quite clear that our field offers indispensable skills for a wide variety of future careers. In fact, a 2015 survey of close to 1,700 B.A. recipients in religious studies from thirty-five different colleges and universities that was conducted by the pre-eminent scholarly organization in our field demonstrated that approximately two-thirds of the alumni surveyed were pursuing careers outside of the academic and applied study of religion – outside, that is, of higher education and ministry. Among the most common careers, each garnering between 5 and 10 percent of the survey responses, were primary and secondary education, non-profit and community organization work, business and finance, law, and medicine. Other career paths represented among the respondents ranged from information technology and library work through government and public administration to the arts.

Prior to the Great Recession, Religious Studies departments in many schools could rely on their students’ interests as sufficient support for their choice to pursue a major. Today, however, and especially at a school that serves a high percentage of working-class and first-generation college students, we do not have that option. Neither can we rely on students double-majoring in order to pursue their interest in religious studies and their need for a degree that they believe “looks good” on their resume, because many UCR students don’t have the time to pursue a second major and still graduate on time.

The proposed combined major addresses the needs of students who, like two-thirds of the respondents in the 2015 survey, see how indispensable the skills and perspectives offered by a religious studies major are for the contemporary workplace but fear that a religious studies major by itself will not translate into a job after college, much less a career. With religion as one of the most important yet most frequently neglected aspects of DEI concerns, and with the skills in cultural competency development that our field encompasses and develops in our majors, this field is critically important to the development of the next generation of leaders in business, industry, government, and the nonprofit sector. We believe that this major will allow students who see this value but fear the post-college job market to pursue all of their interests in a single program.

3. Relationship of the new program to existing programs.

Administrative Studies is a program within the College of Humanities, Arts, and Social Sciences that offers combined majors with Art History, Economics, History, Political Science, and Sociology. This new program would add to the existing ones, expanding options for students who wish to combine administrative studies with a traditional department in CHASS.

4. The proposed curriculum. Great care should be given in this area, correct rubrics should be listed for courses, all cross listings should be listed, unit total considerations should be taken into account and totals should be verified by program staff, faculty, and appropriate Executive Committee personnel. A copy of the proposed program change should be provided for inclusion in the Catalog.

Our proposed curriculum follows the requirements for combined majors with Administrative Studies, as delineated in the catalog:

The programs of all majors should be developed in consultation with their advisors.

5. A list of faculty who will be involved in the program, including those teaching, advising, and administering.

Religious Studies Department faculty:
- Dr. Sahin Acikgoz
- Dr. Michael Alexander
- Dr. Muhamad Ali
- Dr. Elyse Ambrose
- Dr. Ana Bajželj
- Dr. Paul Chang
- Dr. Matthew King
- Dr. Amanda Lucia
- Dr. Pashaura Singh
- Dr. Melissa M. Wilcox (Department chair)

Administrative Studies steering committee:
- Dr. Matthew Mahutga, Chair (Sociology)
- Dr. Taradas Bandyopadhyay (Economics)
- Dr. Jana Grittersova (Political Science)
- Dr. Brian D. Lloyd (History)
- Dr. Jason Weems (Art History)
- Dr. Muhamad Ali (Religious Studies)

6. For interdisciplinary programs, the degree of participation and the role of each department must be explicitly described. The chairs of all participating departments must provide written approval for the creation of the program and indicate their commitment to provide necessary resources including faculty release.

As with other combined majors in Administrative Studies, each half of this major will be run by the appropriate program. Religious Studies courses will be offered by Religious Studies faculty, and Administrative Studies courses will be offered by the various departments that are already contributing to the other combined majors. No other administration (e.g., reviewing capstone projects, etc.) is required, as this program relies solely on coursework and there are no new courses being developed in connection with the proposed new major.

7. Projected enrollment in the program.

We expect initial enrollment to be low – likely fewer than ten – when students are not yet aware of the new option. As word spreads, however, we hope for as many as twenty or more majors at any given time.

8. Name of degree, if applicable, and the anticipated number of degrees to be granted when the program reaches steady state.
B.A. in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies
At steady state, we hope for ten degrees granted per year.

9. Potential impact of the new program on existing programs. If the proposed program includes required courses from a department other than the administering department, the proposal must include a statement from the department indicating that it has been consulted and that it will provide access to the required courses.

   The required courses are already a part of either the Religious Studies major or the existing Administrative Studies combined majors, so our additional majors would be spread out across courses in the wide range of departments that contribute to the ADST combined majors. Furthermore, the vast majority of the requirements for the proposed major are “menu” requirements and therefore there is not a one-course bottleneck that could cause problems for the department offering that course or for majors needing the course to graduate. The smallest class in the set of requirements is the Religious Studies senior seminar, and that course currently has ample room for additional students since it is restricted to graduating seniors.

10. A full listing of resources required for start-up and for operations. In cases where no additional resources will be needed, this must be explicitly stated. This listing may include: personnel (faculty FTE or temporary positions, Teaching Assistants or Readers, administrative staff, technical support); support services including computer facilities and library resources; space requirements. A plan indicating how the resources will be obtained would also be helpful to the committee in reviewing the proposal. A letter of support from the College Dean and/or Executive Vice Chancellor-Provost indicating endorsement as well as a promise of support for the proposal also would be extremely helpful.

   This major draws on existing majors, and we anticipate low total numbers relative to the existing pool of Administrative Studies majors even at steady state; therefore, no additional resources are required.

11. Both internal and external letters of support should be provided with the proposal. Internal letters of support are often from UCR department chairs and faculty of related programs. The external letters should be from other UC campuses or other peer institutions. Letters from off-campus help to establish the quality of the program and its fit within the context of related programs at other universities. Upon consultation with the CEP the demand for external letters may be waived.

12. Approvals from program faculty, College faculty (if the new proposal affects a college regulation), and the appropriate Executive Committee should be obtained before forwarding the new program to the attention of the Senate Analyst for CEP.

   Religious Studies Department vote completed 10/10/2022: 10 eligible, 8 yes, 0 no, 0 abstain, 2 unavailable due to sabbatical

13. All proposals for new programs should be submitted to the Senate Chair no later than March 1 of the academic year prior to the fall quarter in which the proposed program is anticipated to go into effect. This schedule should provide sufficient time for Senate review of the proposal to meet the deadline for final consideration of approval at the May Division Meeting.

The programs of all majors should be developed in consultation with their advisors.
Justification:

Since the 2008 recession, there has been a nationwide trend of steady or even increasing interest in religious studies courses among undergraduates, combined with a trend of falling major numbers. Most commentators attribute this unusual combination to a growing concern among undergraduate students with selecting a major that they believe offers career-relevant skill building; in other words, a major that they (and, at times, their parents) believe will get them a well-paying job immediately after graduation.

Working in a field that, like gender and sexuality studies or ethnic studies, focuses on the transdisciplinary study of a specific aspect of human experience and social structure, we in religious studies are quite clear that our field offers indispensable skills for a wide variety of future careers. In fact, a 2015 survey of close to 1,700 B.A. recipients in religious studies from thirty-five different colleges and universities that was conducted by the pre-eminent scholarly organization in our field demonstrated that approximately two-thirds of the alumni surveyed were pursuing careers outside of the academic and applied study of religion – outside, that is, of higher education and ministry. Among the most common careers, each garnering between 5 and 10 percent of the survey responses, were primary and secondary education, non-profit and community organization work, business and finance, law, and medicine. Other career paths represented among the respondents ranged from information technology and library work through government and public administration to the arts.

Prior to the Great Recession, Religious Studies departments in many schools could rely on their students’ interests as sufficient support for their choice to pursue a major. Today, however, and especially at a school that serves a high percentage of working-class and first-generation college students, we do not have that option. Neither can we rely on students double-majoring in order to pursue their interest in religious studies and their need for a degree that they believe “looks good” on their resume, because many UCR students don’t have the time to pursue a second major and still graduate on time.

The proposed combined major addresses the needs of students who, like two-thirds of the respondents in the 2015 survey, see how indispensable the skills and perspectives offered by a religious studies major are for the contemporary workplace but fear that a religious studies major by itself will not translate into a job after college, much less a career. With religion as one of the most important yet most frequently neglected aspects of DEI concerns, and with the skills in cultural competency development that our field encompasses and develops in our majors, this field is critically important to the development of the next generation of leaders in business, industry, government, and the nonprofit sector. We believe that this major will allow students who see this value but fear the post-college job market to pursue all of their interests in a single program.

Administrative Studies is a program within the College of Humanities, Arts, and Social Sciences that offers combined majors with Art History, Economics, History, Political Science, and Sociology. This new program would add to the existing ones, expanding options for students who wish to combine administrative studies with a traditional department in CHASS.

RE: Combined Major in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies

Dear Colleagues:

On behalf of the College, I write in support of establishing a new major in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies, administered by the Department of Religious Studies. Combined Administrative Studies with other majors in CHASS (Art History, Economics, History, Political Science and Sociology) have been offered for a long time and the new proposed combination will provide additional options for our students.

The proposal makes a compelling case for the major and lays out a clear curriculum for UCR Religious Studies majors who wish to acquire relevant skills to prepare them for careers beyond those in higher education and ministry. The new major will be attractive to students who wish to be educated as humanists able to translate and further develop this training within industry, government, businesses, and non-profit organizations, and by that improving post-college job market outcomes.

The new major is supported by the faculty of the Department of Religious Studies and the Administrative Studies Steering Committee. No new courses need to be created and we expect that the additional costs will be low and manageable, borne by existing administrative operations and personnel. Without reservations, I fully support this proposal.

Respectfully,

Daryle Williams
Professor and Dean

RE: New Major Proposal-Religious Studies/Administrative Studies Major

The CHASS Executive Committee reviewed the new major Proposal-Religious Studies/Administrative Studies Major at the regular meeting on February 23, 2023. The committee thought the department did an excellent job thinking through the benefits of the major. The proposal was straightforward and thorough. The committee approved the new major proposal for the Religious Studies/Administrative Studies Major.
To Whom It May Concern:

I am writing as the director of programs and meeting for the American Academy of Religion (AAR) and the former chair of the Applied Religious Studies Committee, a working committee of the AAR, to enthusiastically support the efforts of the Department of Religious Studies at University of California, Riverside in creating a combined major in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies. The AAR’s mission is to foster excellence in the academic study of religion and enhance the public understanding of religion. I believe that this combined major will offer undergraduate students humanities training while preparing them to move into administrative leadership roles. This, I believe, is imperative to both protecting humanistic critical inquiry and producing thoughtful and critical leaders in diverse industries.

As stated in the proposal, religion and religious diversity is often neglected when considering issues of diversity, equity, inclusion, and belonging. With decreasing majors but continued interest in learning about comparative religious studies and how religious identities contribute to work, social, and political life, this combined major will be a comprehensive and intellectual foundation for students who want to move into various administrative areas such as business, industry, government, and nonprofit sector but who also want to have the religious, cultural, and critical competencies necessary to create and sustain equitable work environments. This is in addition to employers continuing to favor liberal arts training (e.g. critical and analytical reading and writing).

As the organization critically self-reflects on how training in religious studies can be applicable in all areas of workforce and diverse industries, the AAR actively supports initiatives like this to open discussions around diverse career opportunities for undergraduate and graduate students. I am confident that the combined Religious Studies and Administrative Studies BA degree program will provide UCR students with the necessary skills and knowledges to succeed.

If you have any questions about my support, please do not hesitate to reach out. I am excited to support this degree program and appreciate your consideration.

To Whom It May Concern:

I am writing in support of the Department of Religious Studies’ proposal for a combined major in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies. As Department Chair at my previous institution, I led the establishment of a similar program at the master’s degree level, focused on combining religious studies expertise with management skills.

Throughout the country, humanities programs are increasingly seeing graduates draw on their subject matter expertise in non-academic professional settings rather than move into Ph.D. programs. Research conducted by the Teagle Foundation indicates that as many religious studies graduates end up in business, finance, non-profit management, and government/public administration (~20%) as in religiously oriented professions (~20%), and more than in higher education (~13%). In addition, religious studies graduates pursue careers in marketing, hospitality, tourism, the arts, and health care professions (~18% total) where they need administrative skills to succeed. I recently chaired a report for the American Academy of Religion (AAR), our primary national professional organization, focused on the future of our field. Over half the 5000+ members of the AAR work outside academia, and the percentage is increasing. However, according to a recent American Academy of Arts & Sciences study (2017), fewer than 20% of humanities undergraduate programs require occupationally oriented activities for undergraduates, and religious studies programs generally fall behind other humanities programs in this effort.

At the same time, undergraduate students continue to be interested in the big questions asked within the humanities, and they benefit from the critical thinking, written and oral communication, and cultural competency skills developed in humanities programs. Humanities graduates also offer the key “soft skills” that most employers seek, but they often lack fundamental quantitative and administrative skills that many entry-level positions require. A combined major is timely and innovative in speaking to the opportunities and challenges for humanities majors in this moment. The proposed combined major could make a significant difference in UC Riverside undergraduate students’ abilities to launch careers after graduation.

While I cannot speak to resources at UC Riverside specifically, the handful of similar programs established at other universities have required very little (if any) new resources in terms of faculty, because the curriculum includes courses already offered. Additionally, initial enrollments tend to be small, so there is no additional advising effort required.
Based on my experience in religious studies education, my research on present and future career paths of religious studies graduates, and my current work in higher education administration, I support establishing a combined Religious Studies and Administrative Studies major within the Department of Religious Studies at UC Riverside. Please let me know if I can provide additional information.

I'm not sure if there is a format but this should look official:

On the motion to add Religious Studies to the group of CHASS departments with an Administrative Studies component, the Administrative Studies Committee approves by a vote of 5 “yes” 0 “no” and 0 “abstention.”

To whom in may concern:

This letter is written in support of the proposed combined major in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies at UC Riverside. As the Associate Chair of Undergraduate Studies for Religious Studies at Michigan State University, a program that reflects the demographics of UC Riverside students, and that includes an undergraduate concentration in nonprofit leadership, provides core courses for leadership and entrepreneurial majors and minors outside our department, and is in the process of initiating a new master’s program and certificate in global nonprofit leadership, I can uniquely attest to the strength of this proposal and the curricular value of incorporating such a degree program at UC Riverside.

As the objective study of human religious and spiritual cultures, religious studies as a field combines multiple disciplines to offer insight into the belief structures, practices, and orientations that impact how individuals and communities understand self, identity, sex, gender, community, politics, economics, health, war/peace, and so on. While there can be a tendency to conflate religious studies with theology, departments of religious studies are not designed to proselytize, nor to bring attention to only one mode of belief or system of practice. The aim is not to bring religion to people, but rather to study the myriad ways that religion continues to impact our worlds, both spiritually and secularly. Within this approach, religious studies distinctively prepares students to be open, empathetic, critical, and engaged local and global citizens; it offers opportunities to grow in dialogic skills and enhance both tolerance and a commitment to pluralism.

Religious studies provides skills in critical thinking and reading, observation, and written and oral communication essential to any successful career. Further, it tends to open students’ minds to new experiences and ways of approaching the world and to expose students to the diversity and complexities of the world around them. Religious studies thus opens space for not simply discussing DEI, but incorporating these values into our everyday practices and relationships. In developing these insights and skillsets, religious studies prepares students for a host of professional opportunities often removed from the specific purview of religion and religious belief. That is, religious studies as a degree provides hard and soft skills that orient contemporary students to be active, inclusive, and culturally literate; importantly, such skills transfer into almost any professional field.

As an interdisciplinary proposed major, what powerfully stands out about the major in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies at UC Riverside is the combination of resources and expertise—as the proposal notes, “as with other combined majors in Administrative Studies, each half of this major will be run by the appropriate program. Religious Studies courses will be offered by Religious Studies faculty, and Administrative Studies courses will be offered by the various departments that are already contributing to the other combined majors.” Such an interdisciplinary approach provides students with access to and experience in both fields, presenting a truly impactful way to enhance the cultural knowledge and critical insight offered by religious studies with the hard-skill background of administrative studies. Through this combined approach, prospective students would leave UC Riverside with the ability to address a host of professional settings, separating themselves as viable candidates because of the unique skills and cultural understandings that religious studies brings to administrative studies; and vice versa. Students understanding of and engagement with human religious culture is enhanced by seeing it as part and parcel to broader conversations about, and skills related to, the secular job market.

Significantly, religious studies departments across the United States are recognizing how humanistic inquiry, when combined explicitly with concrete, career-relevant skill building, advances student development and constructs significant routes for professional opportunities upon graduation. For many, religious studies emerges as a pathway for enhancing skills that serve a variety of professional avenues including careers in teaching and education, business, human resource management, advertising, print or electronic journalism, radio, television or film, information technology or library sciences, web design, publishing, museum and archival work, travel, politics, law, marketing, and merchandizing. Other religious studies graduates spend time working for social service programs such as the Peace Corps or Teach for America, for nonprofits or NGOs, or as social entrepreneurs.

Anecdotally, here at Michigan State University, for example, of our most recent ten graduates, only two have gone on to pursue a field directly connected to “religion.” The remainder found salaried positions in a host of professional settings that lack any specific religious identity (including video game design, educational nonprofits, and counseling services), or entered master’s programs ranging from human resources (two students) to business administration (one student). The reason for this effective placement is quite simple: the skills developed within a religious studies program, particularly when combined with opportunities to gain valuable insight in and experience with hard skills—such as administrative problem-solving or nonprofit leadership—open multiple openings for professional success.

The aim of combined majors, then, is not to impose religious thinking onto professional avenues, but to advance the capacity for students to successfully integrate into the career marketplace. It is designed to outline educational pathways that combine students’ interests in understanding how religion impacts daily life with the desire for professional outlets and career opportunities. As situated, the combined major in Religious Studies and Administrative Studies at UC Riverside would do just that—I cannot endorse this program strongly enough.

If I can be of any further assistance, please do not hesitate to reach out.
